

Abstract

A fluid pressure near a filter (103) is measured and compared (307) to a predetermined value that is based on one or more engine operating parameters. When the measured fluid pressure deviates enough from the predetermined value by an established amount, an indication of the deviation may be provided to notify of a potential problem with the filter (103), such as obstruction, restriction, or some form of clogging.